

PRESIDENT FACES EMBARRASSMENT IN THE PARKER CASE

Lobby Committee to Probe Charges Made by Senator Ashurst

OF SERIOUS NATURE

Battle Over Judge Has Become One of Most Vicious of Senate in Years

By William K. Hutchinson
I. N. S. Staff Correspondent
WASHINGTON, May 6—President

Hoover and his administration leaders were on the defensive today in the Senate's hectic warfare over confirmation of Judge John J. Parker as an associate Supreme Court justice.

With the International News Service poll still showing Parker's probable rejection, the administration faced renewed attacks on charges of using political pressure to win the nomination's confirmation. The Senate Lobby Committee was expected to act upon the charge of Senator Ashurst (D) of Ariz., that one Senator was offered a Federal judgeship if he would vote for confirmation. The inquiry, if it develops, may prove very embarrassing to the administration.

The Ashurst charges were the most serious made in the Senate in many years. He declared one Senator had told him of the offer of a judgeship in return for his vote. He also declared the "worst lobby I've ever seen in my eighteen years in the Senate" had been actively seeking votes for Parker's confirmation. He further charged that Parker was "persona non grata" to the American Bar Association and that "enormous pressure and tremendous effort was used to get the proper committee of that Association to endorse the nominee."

"My challenge stands," said Ashurst this morning. "I want the lobby committee to put all senators on the witness stand and ask them whether anything was offered them by the administration to vote for Parker. Senators have told me personally they were offered appointments and one told me he was offered a federal judgeship in return for his vote."

The battle over Parker has become one of the most vicious the Senate has experienced in a decade. It has developed an intensity not even dreamed of in the equally sensational fight over confirmation of Chief Justice Charles Evans Hughes.

Pennsylvania, I. O. O. F., and was held

EAST ST. LOUIS, Ill., May 6—

A non-stop flight from Detroit, Mich., to Budapest, Hungary—4,500 miles—is being planned here by Lieutenant Alexander Wilczek Magyar, bombing pilot of the Austrian Army during the World War.

Lieutenant Magyar has enrolled in Parks Air College, Inc., here to prepare for his air jaunt. He is taking a course in aviation and a special course in the flying of big ships.

The Detroit-to-Budapest hop, according to Magyar, is expected to get under way on June 15th, when he will take off from Detroit with a comparatively light load of gasoline. He plans to refuel in the air at St. Johns, Newfoundland. From that point he will continue on his journey over the Atlantic Ocean. If necessary, it was pointed out, Magyar will refuel a second time in Ireland.

The flight will be attempted in a Lockheed Sirius monoplane—a sister ship to the plane in which Colonel Charles A. Lindbergh and Mrs. Lindbergh recently bettered Captain Frank

JAMES MARSHALL DIES; CIVIL WAR VETERAN

Deceased Had Many Thrilling Experiences During War Between North and South

WAS IN HIS 90TH YEAR

The last of Bristol's H. Clay Beatty Post No. 73, G. A. R., members, James Marshall, died at the home of his son, Leonard, yesterday afternoon, in his ninetieth year.

Mr. Marshall did not suffer an ache or a pain but for the past three days had expressed himself as feeling "awfully tired." He spent most of the time in bed.

The aged man, who had a most interesting career during the days of the Civil War, delighted in recounting accounts of the engagements participated in by his company during those trying days. During the past few years, when he led a life of retirement, he pleasantly passed time in reminiscing, and telling to members of the younger generation of the times when he shook hands with Abraham Lincoln.

The late Mr. Marshall was born in England on the tenth of August, 1840, and came to the United States when five years of age. He resided for a time in Chester, Pa., later moving to Tullytown.

On the 20th of August, 1861, according to his own words he "slid from a load of hay and hurried to Fallingston, where I enlisted in the Lincoln Cavalry, afterward a part of the Second Pennsylvania Cavalry."

For three years the then resident of Tullytown engaged in activities of the national strife, participating in the battles of Bull Run, Chancellorsville, Fredericksburg, and several others.

When his period of enlistment was finished he returned to his Tullytown home, and in 1888 moved to his horough, where he has since resided. For some time he was engaged in work for the Delaware and Lehigh Canal Company, and worked for other local companies.

Eight of Mr. Marshall's children are still living, and he is blessed with 31 grandchildren, 27 great grandchildren, and five great, great grandchildren.
He was a member of the H. Clay Beatty Post, and for some time acted as its quartermaster.

At one time when telling a friend of his activities during the war Mr.
Marshall said "I had two horses killed under me, and when one of them was shot I was wounded too. A ball from a rifle struck me in the thigh, but I didn't get off duty. I just fought on, but I certainly hated to lose that ani-

DIRIGIBLES TO FACE ACID TEST AS PASSENGER SHIPS WITHIN THE NEXT MONTH

Foremost Aircraft Backers of Many Countries Are Convinced Time is Near When Dirigibles Will Have Regular Routes Across Oceans

By J. C. Oestreicher
I. N. S. Cable Editor

NEW YORK, May 6—With millions of dollars in backing awaiting only the result of the trials, the practicability of lighter-than-air craft for regular commercial traffic across the Atlantic Ocean will be put to the test by two nations of Europe next month.

Convinced that the time is near when giant dirigibles will ply regular routes across the oceans, slicing in two the fastest speeds yet attained by steamships, two European governments are bending all their efforts toward making the forthcoming trials a success.

From the shores of Germany and England two giant dirigibles will speed westward within the next few weeks, carrying passengers and mails to destinations on the North and South American Continents. Canada, the United States and South America, through the medium of these aerial monsters, will be brought nearer than ever before from the commercial point of view with the nations of the Old World.

Interest in the two flights is about evenly divided. Germany will be sending to America her tried and true Graf Zeppelin, veteran of many a combat with ocean wind and storm, which has already crossed the Atlantic five times and encircled the globe in less than twenty-one days.

Great Britain is relying upon the R-100, which only recently completed her trial flight.

According to present plans, the Graf will leave on May 18, making a stop at Seville, Spain, where arrangements have been made for refueling and taking on additional cargo before the trans-Atlantic flight will be made.
From Seville the airship will go to Pernambuco, Brazil and thence to Rio de Janeiro, later returning to Friedrichshafen by way of Havana and Lakehurst.

Dr. Hugo Eckener, commander of the Graf Zeppelin, is determined to carry out this projected flight with the same clock-like precision and punctuality which prevailed on the record-breaking flight around the world. For while the globe-girdling trip was more or less in the nature of a sight-seeing jaunt, this next flight will pave the way, if successful, for establishment of regular passenger and commercial dirigible air lines throughout the world.

The R-100 will head for Canada, carrying freight and mails and a number of distinguished passengers. It is designed as a "British Empire achievement," linking England with her largest and greatest dominion, but the underlying motive will be to demonstrate, to Britain's satisfaction, the practicability of lighter-than-air ships for regular long-distance flights.

In Great Britain and Germany, as well as in the United States, large sums of money are being held in readiness to be put forward as airship line subsidies if the events of the next few weeks fulfill all expectations. The German government has co-operated to the fullest possible extent in the activities of the Graf Zeppelin, and Britain is reported to be equally ready to aid in the construction of new dirigibles and establishment of regu-

Animal Furnishes Lots of Excitement at Pond and Washington Streets

ATTRACTS BIG CROWD

A bull being transported in a motor truck over Pond street early last evening became somewhat ferocious when he got a glimpse of two women wearing red sweaters at Pond and Washington streets.

The bovine began to stam pede and tore loose the side of the truck. The men in charge quickly tied him with ropes and after making the bull fast to all four sides of the truck body, made temporary repairs to the vehicle and then proceeded on their way.

The bull furnished lots of excitement for a time and amused a crowd of onlookers who were attracted to the scene.

RETARDING AVIATION

Colonel Lindbergh's latest triumphs in the air and several recent air disasters have provided all present and future pilots with a manual on how and how not to fly a plane.

The difference between Lindbergh and the pilots who figure in these horrifying week-end crack-ups is obvious, and it is more than a matter of technical skill. Most of these accidents are due to a failure to observe the precautions that are inviolable laws with Lindbergh.

The first law of safety in the air is the law of safe altitude. It requires that planes in normal flight be kept at a height of 5,000 feet or more. On his recent record-breaking transcontinental flight, the ace of aviators maintained an altitude of 10,000 feet or more.

Maintaining an ample gliding range requires altitude, and a gliding range is a requisite of safe flying. Many accidents occur because pilots, due to lack of altitude in time of trouble, cannot choose a landing place. The large number of air-mail pilots who have been able to glide to a safe landing or parachute to safety in emergencies is due to rigid observance of the law of altitude.

Every state regulating aviation recognizes the dangers of low flying and legislates against it. Planes are kept at a proper height when passing over inhabited areas and large assemblies, and stunting is forbidden at low altitudes.

Because of those who persist in acting on the theory that safety laws are made to be broken the development of commercial flying must be retarded and airplane accidents multiplied.

SYNOPSIS
David Wade, robbed while drunk by O'Shane, trader in a New Guinea settlement, is besought by Stella Blackney, who cared for him while recovering from his spree, to take her away with him. She fears O'Shane, who is her husband, and is to claim his rights on the death of her ailing mother. Pitying her plight, Wade agrees and they sail to the South Sea island of Motogaru where they meet Moira, a fascinating half-caste girl, anxious to get a white husband. Unable to marry Wade, whom she now loves, Stella fears Moira will win him away from her and she refuses to remain on the island. They quarrel, but Stella gives way. Moira is greatly attracted by Wade.

Again he shifted uneasily. "I've tried to bring her up like a white girl. I want her to be a white girl in every way. I don't want her to go native. But you know how it is, m'm. It's in her blood. It's hard to change what's in the blood."

"I understand," she murmured sympathetically.
Melrose nodded. "I'm hoping you will be great friends, m'm. Perhaps with a lady like you for companion it will be different. I tell you, m'm, it did my heart good when Moira told me a white lady might be living here. A daughter like her can be a bit of a handful, though she is a good girl and all that—I mean regarding men."

The gleam on the beach was gone now, and the sheen of the palms. The crew boys, their day's work done, were gathering into baskets the shells they had cleaned. David was examining the shells and talking with the natives.

They had come to trade.

"It's been worrying me a whole lot," said Melrose; "what's to become of her, I mean. I won't be with her always—"

"You mustn't talk like that," Stella put in. "You are not old really."

He gave a sad little smile. To Stella it was like the smile of a sick yet patient child.

"I've got a diver's heart. You know what that means? One of these days I'll go snuff—just like that. Moira don't know about it. I haven't told her, and she's never guessed. I don't reckon it would do any good to tell her." He paused. "I'll be right glad, m'm, if you two'll be friends. It will make the future easy for me, like."

He rose. Stella, profoundly affected, made to speak, though what she was about to say she scarcely knew; but he prevented her by saying:

"And now that is enough of me and my troubles, I reckon. What about a bit of music? You like music?" He went to the gramophone, wound it, and put on a record. The music entered on the quiet like a muffled footstep. To Stella's surprise, it was a Beethoven symphony, and one she particularly loved. There seemed something incongruous in hearing such music on the deck of a pearly schooner in an isolated part of the South Seas.

"That's the stuff I like," said Melrose. "The classical stuff—that's the word, ain't it? I've got jazz tunes, though, if you'd rather have one."

"No—no; leave it!" Stella whispered. "It is too wonderful for words."

Again Melrose nodded. "I'm glad you like it, m'm. Those are the only kind of tunes I really like. They tell me things, do the classical tunes. They're like the sea and the wind, somehow, and the sails when they're bellying to the breeze. I reckon the feller who made up this tune knew something of the sea."

He stopped abruptly. Alongside had come a canoe, the canoe which had come alongside the cutter; and standing at the steer-oar, as she had stood then, was Moira.

Stella rose. The Beethoven symphony was less than half-way through, and she wished it were finished. The music irritated her suddenly, jarred her, distracted her.

"Ah! Here she is at last!" said Melrose. Moira was coming along the deck, coming with her curious crossed-step walk. In the dimming light she seemed more magnificent, more regal than ever. Stella stared at her, fascinated, as though the half-caste were a snake and she its victim. It was almost as though she were under a spell. When Moira eagerly offered a hand, she took it like one in a trance, and mumbled incoherently. By a tremendous effort of will she collected herself. David had come at last, now, and Melrose was introducing him:

"My daughter—Mr. Wade." David took Moira's hand and murmured conventional words of greeting. On his face was an expression of keenest admiration and surprise. Admiration!

"There is no need to introduce Mrs. Wade to you, Moira," said Melrose politely. Stella scarcely heard him. She was looking at David. David was still holding the half-caste's hand, as though in his blind of admiration and surprise he had forgotten to release it.

Again the Beethoven symphony welled up and out. Stella ran to the machine, stopped it, took off the record, and put on the first that lay to hand. It was a jazz, crashing and discordant.

A feeling of abandon came to her. "Let us dance, David!" she said. "Dance!"

CHAPTER VIII

In a week they were established in a house the natives built for them on a site near the village, a little above the tide-mark.

It was a house spacious and airy, standing on tall piles for coolness in the true manner of tropic dwellings, with four large rooms, and on all sides a veranda a dozen or more feet wide.

"A perfectly satisfactory house," David pronounced it when it was finished, and Stella agreed.

But it was to Stella more than merely a house. It was a Home. In the whole of her life she had never had a Home.

She had an enthusiasm for the place. She planned to make it into the finest home possible. The very finest. It was her home, hers and David's. She would make it into concrete expression of her love for him.

"I just adore it," she murmured as they stood together on the front veranda the day they took possession.

He looked at her with evident relief. "I am glad to hear you say that," he said.

A curious, subdued kind of happiness was hers. The emotional tenseness of the day of her arrival was gone. She had reacted from it. It came to her that it was just as well she had so reacted. To have maintained such an emotional pitch for long would have resulted at best in hysteria, at worst in madness. She was grasping at happiness while it was there to be grasped, taking the good the present offered and leaving the bad of the future alone.

Only twice had she seen the half-caste during these busy days, and each time only for a few minutes when Moira called with her father to see how the house-building was progressing. And each time Stella was able to regard her almost objectively, as a being scarcely connected with herself and her affairs.

Through the pictures framed by the palm-branches the first canoe came skimming; a man stood in it, naked and bronze. His paddles threw up little hills of quicksilver. On the platform spanning the outrigger was a heap of coconuts. They looked like a heap of men's heads. The man twisted his paddle, and the canoe ran up on the beach. The second canoe followed it, and the two men began unloading their cargoes.

"They come to trade," came Lora's voice, and the native girl appeared on the veranda.

"Already?" Stella asked. "Why, we are hardly settled yet."

"They can't wait, snabada. They want tobacco and cloth and the many other things." She paused, seeking a word. "They eager."

The beginning of the trading signaled the beginning of her life at Motogaru, and as thoughts were something infectious, the eagerness of the natives translated itself to her. She was seized with eagerness to convert into accomplished fact her desire to make of this place a home.

She gave herself whole-heartedly to the task. The last few days had been full, but the days that followed were fuller. She had Manua and Dolobe convert packing-cases and the like into creditable furniture and with her own hands made for it covers from the cloth in the trading-stock. She had some of the women weave mats wherewith to cover the floor, mats soft and pliable almost as blankets. The veranda she had screened with laced palm-fronds and the corners transformed into cool retreats.

Through New Medicine

MRS. MARGARET SWEENEY

"What glorious health Konjola has given me," said Mrs. Margaret Sweeney, 434 Durfor street, Philadelphia. "For months I did not know what it was to enjoy a meal nor a full night's rest, because of stomach trouble and nervousness. Many nights I walked the floor in agony from indigestion."

"Everything I tried failed to help me. But Konjola was different from all the others. It went right to work. In three weeks every trace of indigestion had disappeared. Today I can eat a hearty meal and enjoy every bite because the food digests perfectly. My nerves are calm and quiet, too. All this I owe to Konjola."

Konjola will produce amazing results when given a fair trial, and six to eight bottles are recommended as a fair test. Konjola has become the most talked of medicine in America because it makes good.

Konjola is sold in Bristol at Hoffman's Cut Rate Store, and by all the best druggists in all towns throughout this entire section. (Adv.)

mal, because I was so attached to it." This shows something of the kindly nature and the brave spirit of the one who served his country so well in time of need.

The deceased was present at the occasion of the reception tendered to Lincoln, and was always pleased to recount the actions of the war-time president on that day. He was very proud of the fact that he had met "Honest Abe" on three different occasions, and greatly admired his noble character and his spirit of understanding.

Because of his enthusiasm for the lamented president, Mr. Marshall for the past several years of his life gave to each of his grandchildren a dollar bill when they completed memorizing Lincoln's Gettysburg address. He spent much time in studying Lincoln and liked to read accounts of the Civil War.

The deceased was a member of the Methodist Church.

Dirigibles to Face Acid Test As Passenger Ships in Month far commercial lines when the right time comes.

European aeronautical authorities, almost unanimous in their confidence in lighter-than-air craft as the logical means for long-distance aerial transportation of passengers and freight will be watching the two coming flights with unprecedented interest.

While few believe there is any real danger of dirigibles replacing steamships in trans-Atlantic travel, there is general belief that the next few years will see this type of craft in great demand for shipment of highly perishable goods and other commodities where utmost speed in transportation is essential.

Nor is Europe alone in the development and exploitation of dirigibles for commercial use. Soviet Russia has shown an active interest in this type of aircraft, and has laid complete plans for establishment of a regular dirigible air route from Moscow to the White Sea area for the transmission of cargo and mails.

Two "baby zeppelins," each of 10,000 cubic metres capacity, have been ordered built by the Soviet government for this air line. Regular service will be started as soon as these craft are ready, and it is hoped later to extend the service over many hundreds of miles of Russian territory hitherto served haltingly by slow and infrequent trains.

In this connection, it is interesting to note that efforts are under way in the United States to obtain dirigible subsidies so that America can take its place in this new and hitherto undeveloped field of transportation. The most important step in this direction is the bill introduced in Congress by Senator McNary of Oregon, which would provide for the United States government to subsidize dirigible development up to 75 per cent, of the cost of construction. The measure would place commercial airships in the same category with vessels of the American Merchant Marine.

In a judge it's Character in a cigarette it's Taste

WHAT INTEGRITY is to a public official, taste is to a cigarette—the one quality that wins and holds public confidence and esteem.

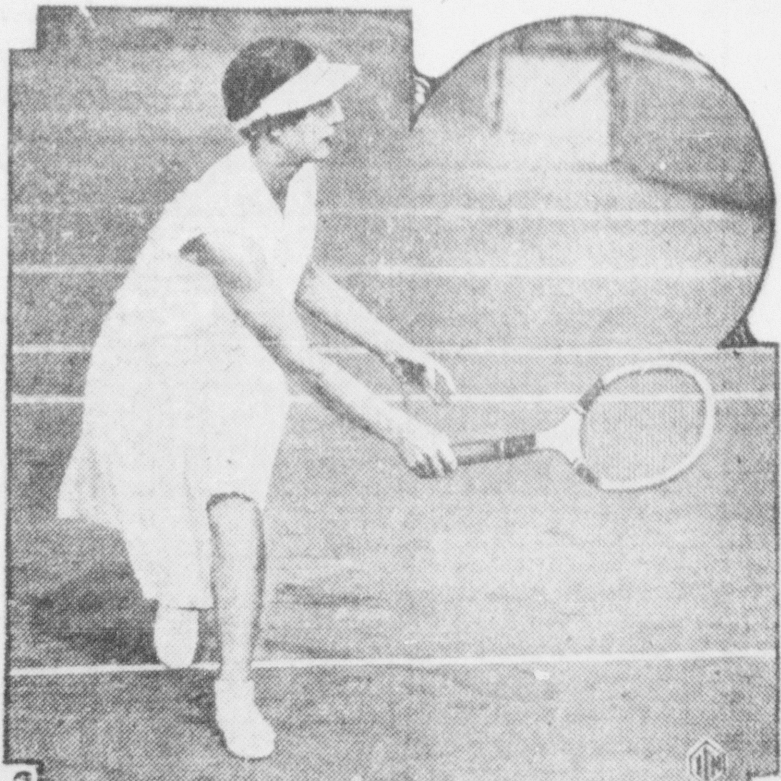

ON TASTE AND TASTE ALONE, Chesterfield continues to gain smokers, both men and women. Chesterfields are mild—not strong or harsh—yet they have richness of flavor and aroma. They are not insipid or tasteless.

WITNESS THE STEADY GROWTH in the popularity of Chesterfield—a popularity which proves that with smokers, as with us, it's "TASTE above everything".

We state it as our honest belief that the tobaccos used in Chesterfield cigarettes are of finer quality and hence of better taste than in any other cigarette at the price. LIGGETT & MYERS TOBACCO CO.
